A Lesson in Love: A sweet Christian Scottish springtime romance (The Macleans Book 3) Autumn Macarthur
Love can make life complicated...

Sports teacher Fraser Maclean has worked with Sarah Browne for eight months at their Edinburgh high school. She's not involved with anyone else, and she seems to enjoy his company, so why won't the pretty trainee teacher see him outside school? Despite their attraction, he has to take no for an answer. Besides, he wants a simple, uncomplicated life, and he suspects Sarah is far from uncomplicated.

Sarah's worked hard to control her feelings for Fraser and keep him at arm's length. He's kind, athletic, funny, and he appeals to her like no other man, but she can't trust he'll love her enough to share her burdens and stick around when things get tough. They're safer staying friends. That's enough. It has to be.

When they build a sensory garden at their church together, he discovers the real reason she won't date. Caring for her ill mother dominates Sarah's days and nights. Getting involved with her means things will get a whole lot of complicated. No more simple life. And Sarah still won't trust him with her biggest secret of all.

Can the two teachers learn God's lessons in love, or will fear and doubt keep them apart?

33,000 words, 144 paperback pages

The Macleans books #1 & 2 show Fraser's older brother Mac and sister Catriona finding the partners God intends for them. But there's no need to read their stories first. Each book is a complete-in-itself romance.

Faith, hope, and heartwarming - inspirational romance to make you smile!
